Among both, these can seem fairly lax: Specific mention should be made of a well-funded programme from DG Innovation to put European start-ups in contact with potential Chinese suitors. The European Commission, basing its decisions on its own studies, would identify countries and sectors where there are significant price distortions.

A partnership and cooperation agreement PCA in EU parlance would require more. A third example is ongoing: China signing up to the December Climate Conference was a milestone, even with commitments that were scheduled for only after and without verification besides periodic reports on implementation by all signatories. One was a deal with Pipistrel, the maker of ultra-light planes, hybrid motors, and gliders, for production in China; the other was the purchase of Elaphe, a company designing electric engine in wheel sets – in other words, key components of the future aircraft, drone, and auto industries.

Few foreign companies have ever bothered to register a case with the China Int is especially the case when it comes to China, about which many are only just understanding that there is a serious question to respond to. On trade and investment, a real break among Europeans in negotiations with China would strike at the heart of the EU.
