This, in turn, motivates even more withdrawal, more isolationism and apocalyptic fantasy - and more desperately concocted technologies and business plans. You've read of three free articles this month. Or maybe building robots to serve as guards and workers - if that technology could be developed in time.

From this the tech giants have created de facto monopolies while evading the tax. Overall, the NetzDG might after all form part of a civilizing influence on online debate, instead of having a one-sided chilling effect on freedom of expression. The low tax rates that technology companies are typically paying on these large rewards are also perverse, given that their success was built on technologies funded and developed by high-risk public investments:

A few quick rejoinders, if you will indulge me: Technology, Work, and Urban Ecosystems: Again, the more problematic scenario arises when the social media platform operator mistakenly deletes legal content.
