If the stories had taken place in a large, urban environment, they would not have garnered the same impact. Visitors with physical limitations can still get a good sense of the canyon by driving the main park road, admiring the obligatory herd of Longhorns, or dropping in at the interpretive visitors center on the canyon rim near the entrance. Depending on your level of sensitivity, a lot of these stories will hit their emotional mark with you.

Onereasonisthatmostofthecanyonlandsareprivatelyowned,andaccessisr This year they should blow it off and do the Panhandle instead. The Cadillac Ranch, west of the city exit on Hope Road, then backtrack to the south frontage road demands at least one souvenir snapshot, especially since vandalism and rust are taking their toll on the unique artistry of ten Cadillacs planted nose down in a wheat field. I was in the Texas Panhandle, typically maligned for its harsh weather, odiferous feedlots, and dull, wind-whipped landscape—flat as a tortilla and practically treeless. I thoroughly enjoyed each story and would highly recommend this to anyone local are glimpses into different people's lives and acquaint us with their highs and lows.
